SELECTED PAPER ABSTRACT

Gender Differences in the Cost of Corrections in Group Work

Collaboration is an integral component of workplace environments, but it also involves correcting one's colleagues. Using a quasi-laboratory experiment, I study whether people dislike collaborating with someone who corrects them and whether men dislike women's correction more than men's correction. I find that people are less willing to collaborate with others who have corrected them, even if the correction improved group performance, and it is unlikely due to their misunderstanding of the correction quality. Regarding the corrector's gender, I do not find consistent evidence that men (or women) dislike women's corrections more and that people perceive the experimental task as gender-neutral. These findings suggest that interpersonal frictions can be detrimental to group efficiency and peer learning, but women do not experience harsher frictions in a gender-neutral task.

The Welfare Effects of Increased Legal Tolerance toward Domestic Violence

This paper studies how increased legal tolerance toward domestic violence affects married women's welfare using the domestic violence decriminalization bill introduced to the Russian national congress in 2016. Using difference-in-differences and flexibly controlling for macroeconomic shocks, I find that the bill decreased married women's life satisfaction and increased depression. In addition, I find suggestive evidence that while unmarried women began to express less tolerance toward domestic violence, married women did not, possibly due to the suppressive atmosphere the law brought to the role of married women. These findings suggest that the bill reduced married women's welfare partly through a psychological channel and highlights the importance of the legal institution in harnessing domestic violence even in a country where women's labor force participation rate is very high.
